Image analysis is a well known technique for automated identification of patterns, objects, and regions within an image. For example, in high resolution aerial and satellite images, segmentation of snowfields and sea ice features from coastal regions and forests can be used to identify land and water and changes in land cover, such as deforestation or deforestation due to development or dam construction. Segmentation in microscopic images of liquid crystal regions, such as electroluminescent regions within a liquid crystal display cell, can be used to identify defects and to predict the reliability of yield during manufacturing. Segmentation of liquid crystal regions in high resolution video images can be used to control the light level in a liquid crystal display cell while a portion of the display is darkened so that the cell remains responsive to the unilluminated regions and does not turn on. Image analysis can also be used in connection with photographs of people for identification, such as in connection with passports and other identification documents.

With such systems, the person's face and other objects and regions within an image are segmented to create a digital representation of the person and one or more regions within the image. For example, the person's face can be segmented for comparison to a digital representation stored in a database to verify the person's identity. Flexible feature extraction and efficient feature recognition are two important problems in image processing. Flexible feature extraction refers to the extraction of useful features from an image having large background and foreground regions and a random distribution of features within. Features that are extracted should be robust to variations in the background, foreground and image. Efficient feature recognition refers to the process of finding the image features corresponding to a set of visual words. The visual words are generally selected to be representative of the visual features of the image with no regard to the distribution of features within the image. However, in practice, some overlapping may be required in order to include all features. If the overlapping is not too large, the recognition task can be simplified. Accordingly, it is desirable to define a set of representative visual words with only slight overlap so that nearly all visual words are selected. Some conventional feature extraction methods use a combination of motion and topology (e
